

THE MAURITANIAN

The motion picture THE MAURITANIAN, based on Mohamedou Ould Slahi's inspiring New York Times best-selling memoir, 'Guantánamo Diary', is helmed by Kevin Macdonald, the Academy Award® winning director of One Day in September (Best Documentary, Features), Whitney, How I Live Now and The Last King of Scotland which garnered multiple awards including a Best Actor Academy Award® for Forest Whitaker.

The cast is led by Tahar Rahim (The Looming Tower, A Prophet/Un Prophète) as Mohamedou Ould Slahi; Academy Award® winner Jodie Foster (The Silence of the Lambs, Contact, Taxi Driver) in the role of Slahi's defense lawyer Nancy Hollander; Independent Spirit Awards winner Shailene Woodley (Divergent, The Descendants, The Fault in Our Stars) in the role of Attorney Teri Duncan; BAFTA®, Golden Globe® and Academy Award® 'Best Actor' nominee, Benedict Cumberbatch (The Imitation Game, Doctor Strange, Star Trek Into Darkness) in the role of Marine Corps Lawyer, Lieutenant Colonel Stuart Couch; and Zachary Levi (Shazam!, The Marvelous Mrs. Maisel) in the role of Federal Agent, Neil Buckland.

THE MAURITANIAN follows the remarkable true story of Mohamedou Ould Slahi (Tahar Rahim) who was captured by the U.S. government and imprisoned for years without trial at Guantanamo Bay (GTMO). It is an inspiring account of survival against all odds as Slahi, in his fight for freedom, finds allies in defense attorney Nancy Hollander (Jodie Foster) and her associate Teri Duncan (Shailene Woodley). Through Nancy and Teri's controversial advocacy and evidence uncovered by formidable military prosecutor Lieutenant Colonel Stuart Couch (Benedict Cumberbatch), a shocking and far-reaching conspiracy is revealed. THE MAURITANIAN is a commentary on the importance of the Rule of Law and extremism of all kinds, but is also a tender, funny, uplifting film about Mohamedou, an extraordinary man whose humanity triumphed, leaving those around him profoundly changed.

The screenplay is penned by M.B. Traven, and Rory Haines & Sohrab Noshirvani (The Informer). The Screen Story is written by M.B. Traven.

Benedict Cumberbatch is producing with Adam Ackland and Leah Clarke for their company SunnyMarch, alongside Lloyd Levin and Beatriz Levin for Shadowplay Features, Mark Holder and Christine Holder through their newly formed venture Wonder Street, and Michael Bronner for Curlyhead Films, and Branwen Prestwood-Smith.

The creative team includes Director of Photography, Alwin Küchler (Steve Jobs, Sunshine); Production Designer, and Oscar® nominee, Michael Carlin (Enola Holmes, The Duchess); and Oscar® winning Costume Designer, Alexandra Byrne (Mary Queen of Scots, The Avengers).

The film is funded by Divergent Media, Great Point Media, 30WEST and Topic Studios in partnership with BBC Film, which also developed the project. Executive Producers are 30WEST principals Micah Green, Dan Steinman and Dan Friedkin, Topic Studios' Michael Bloom, Maria Zuckerman and Ryan Heller, BBC Film's Rose Garnett, Great Point Media's Jim Reeve and Robert Halmi, Convergent Media's Zak Kilberg and Russell Smith, STX's Robert Simonds, Adam Fogelson, and John Friedberg. Larry Siems, Donald Sabourin and Mohamedou Ould Slahi serve as co-producers.

STXinternational, a division of STX Entertainment, holds the international rights and will be directly distributing in the UK and Ireland.

ABOUT THE PRODUCTION

DEVELOPMENT

The genesis of the production began in 2015 while Mohamedou Ould Slahi was still incarcerated in Guantanamo Bay (GTMO), when producers Lloyd and Beatriz Levin and Michael Bronner traveled to Albuquerque to meet with Slahi's lawyers, Nancy Hollander and Teri Duncan. Slahi's memoir 'Guantánamo Diary' was optioned by producers Lloyd Levin and Beatriz Levin, and Mark Holder and Christine Holder of Wonder Street.

Lloyd recalls, "When we read 'Guantanamo Diary' we were surprised by the wit, poetry and wisdom of Mohamedou's writing and moved by his story, and felt Mohamedou's innate humanity and impulse to see that what we all have in common is greater than what divides us, despite his brutal and unjust experience, was inspiring, timely and would make for an important movie."

'Guantánamo Diary' went on to be published in the U.K. in 2015 by Jamie Byng from Canongate. Producer Adam Ackland recalls, "Jamie, who is a dear friend of ours, asked Benedict to participate in the launch of 'Guantánamo Diary'. After Benedict read a passage from this brilliant book, he fell in love with it and said 'we've got to make this movie, we've got to find out who has the rights'."

Benedict himself remembers the moment he discovered Mohamedou's book "I picked the book up and read it from beginning to end and was just blown away by Mohamedou, by his humanity and his humor, his extraordinary endurance, the fact that he came through all of this and emerged to teach us all something about the indefatigable joy of the human spirit. I was utterly charmed by him and his story was heart-breaking and troubling."

Nancy Hollander, an International Criminal Defense Attorney, who for years had relentlessly fought for Mohamedou Ould Slahi's release, recalls, "Lloyd and Bea Levin and Michael Bronner came to my office and we signed the contract for the film rights while Mohamedou was still in prison." Upon Slahi's release on October 17, 2016, Bronner travelled to Mauritania, beginning a period of intense work together on the story.

Already working with SunnyMarch on another project, and aware of Adam and Benedict's passionate interest in Mohamedou and his memoir, Shadowplay brought the project to SunnyMarch to see if they wanted to join forces in getting the movie made. Producer Leah Clarke, explains, “the company was set up partly to find roles that interested Benedict, but more to take risks: to work with up and coming directors, and adapt material that feels cinematic, but tricky and difficult. So, a lot of our projects have that DNA and THE MAURITANIAN was a perfect example.”

Producer Adam Ackland recalls that early on this was a project that would see Benedict strictly staying put as a producer on the film “he was producing it actively with us, and when one of the drafts came in he read it and realized he’d love to play Couch.”

Now the filmmakers embarked on the challenge of raising financing, Clarke reflects, “when we were trying to raise the financing a lot of people didn’t want to go near it because it’s Guantanamo and too political, and too complicated. I think people felt that it would also be a downer. So, our main job was trying to convince them that this was an uplifting movie, like Shawshank Redemption or Life is Beautiful.”

In Divergent Media, 30WEST, Topic Studios, BBC Films and STX International, the producers found partners who were willing to support the production.

With the project slowly starting to come together, the search began to find the filmmaker who would be responsible for shepherding Mohamedou’s story, a role that Ackland knew could only be filled by a very particular director. “We didn’t actually go to that many filmmakers because it’s so important to get the right one and so we sat on it for a while.”

The producers soon realized that multiple award-winning director, Kevin Macdonald, would be the best filmmaker to bring Mohamedou's story to the screen. The Scottish filmmaker has carved a formidable reputation in the entertainment industry for his skill in documentary and drama filmmaking, born out by The Last King of Scotland, which received widespread acclaim and garnered multiple awards including a 'Best Actor' Academy Award® for Forest Whitaker. "Kevin is brilliant at real life stories, he's a very urgent, passionate filmmaker with a skill for thrillers, and we felt that his taste for stories from far flung places and interest in the lives of real people would be good for the project and would honor Mohamedou's story" affirms Clarke.

Kevin was going to need some convincing. A first draft of the script existed, credited to M.B. Traven and based on extensive interviews with Mohamedou, beginning at his home in Mauritania just three weeks after his release. Macdonald worked with the writer, and the new draft went to Cumberbatch and Tahar Rahim, both of whom enthusiastically embraced playing roles in the film. At that point, Macdonald made contact with Mohamedou via Skype. Macdonald thought "oh that will be interesting and I did a Skype call with him. And the man is so charming and so funny and so not what you expect, from an internationally wanted, excused, terrorist, criminal who was accused of recruiting people for 9/11 and financing terror. He's so the opposite of what you imagine, he's so in love with American culture, he can quote every line of The Big Lebowski, he knows it by heart because he watched it 110 times while he was in prison."

With Kevin now on board, Benedict recalls the challenges they faced and how Macdonald instantly proved he was the right man for the role. “It’s a difficult subject matter to get financed and we constantly had to strategize and talk about how we would bring this story into reality. He met it all with such good grace. He fought for things that he cared passionately for which is incredibly important for a project that has this kind of integrity attached to it. He’s the best spokesman for this film, as well as the best director for it. He so thoroughly believes in the importance of making films like this, the difficulty of them is worth overcoming at every level to get the results.”

With a strong background in creating thought provoking, hard hitting, politically charged thrillers Kevin knew he had the opportunity to tell a vital story that leans towards his particular cinematic skillset. “I knew from the beginning that it was this combination of politics and an outrageous crime against humanity that got my blood boiling but also, I could see that it could be a real thriller, and could entertain people. And so, there needs to be a lot of sugar in with the medicine and I saw the opportunity in this film to make something that is a thriller and which hopefully has that edge-of-the-seat quality but also a film in which it is about really wonderful characters, who you fall in love with.”

Two-time Academy Award® winning actress Jodie Foster who is herself an acclaimed film director (Little Man Tate and Money Monster), was cast in the role of Mohamedou’s criminal defense attorney, Nancy Hollander. Foster said “I just love how Kevin’s mind works; he’s really curious and inquisitive and I’ve been really amazed by this shoot to see how the documentary spirit really works, that it really does work by instinct. Kevin really believes that the way you approach making films is that you don't try to control it or shape it. You spend your time noticing, you're in the space, you see the characters and then you notice what's happening, and then you make sure that you capture that. I think that really works for this film."

(Real) Mohamedou says, "I love that Kevin says 'no matter how dramatic this scene is, the reality was more dramatic than this', because this is beyond anything you could imagine. I know that some actors did not feel comfortable to do certain scenes and I completely understand because the same thing happened to me. I did not want to go through this, believe me, but I had no choice."

ADAPTING THE BOOK

Clarke explains, "our movie isn't a direct adaptation of the book, the book is Mohamedou's autobiography so he can't tell the story from the other perspectives. We cover the first two thirds of the story, until his appeal."

The key challenge for the filmmakers was making a true-life story. "They are always difficult, especially if they're near history because you have a responsibility to everybody and it's a hot button subject" explains Clarke. "We didn't want a grim, liberal telling off. It had to be a human drama where the audience could have an experience that changes them and is a talking point. The story is driven by Mohamedou who is a transcendent person, a philosopher, he's so witty and so compassionate and that's really the reason we wanted to make this film, because his message and his spirit will change all our lives for the better."

Ackland added “I think you have got to be careful in telling true stories because you want it to be factually correct but you also want it to be interesting and sometimes those two don’t go together very well. It was all about finding the filmmaker who could properly pump the heart and personality of Mohamedou and make it his story.”

Macdonald was more than aware of what a huge challenge the team would have when adapting such a thought provoking story: “how do we tell this incredibly complex story, which has geopolitics, which has legal terminology, which has all these different countries involved? How do we tell that in a way that’s simple enough for an audience to grasp and also operate in a way that’s good storytelling, kind of like a thriller? I wanted this to be an exciting story, you are on the edge of your seat wanting to know what is going to happen next. So, that was the challenge of writing the script; how do we pack as much of this in, as much of this complex material in as possible and still make it an enjoyable experience, still make it an entertaining film? I think what we all wanted to do was make an entertaining piece of cinema about an important true story.”

Foster weighs in, “the most difficult part I think is just wanting to get it right, we want to be fair to all of the parties because I really believe that the truest stories are the ones where there just aren’t any bad guys. Where it’s just human beings that come together, trying to do the best that they can, but they’re guided by fear and I think there is a lesson in this story; is that impulse, that fear impulse is so strong and unfortunately it was in the era of Guantanamo, and in the era of 9/11, which took over the American psyche. We were making decisions, we were making international foreign policy decisions by fear instead of using the laws and the rules that we knew.”

Slahi, who is the first detainee to publish a memoir while imprisoned, was prohibited from receiving a copy of his published book while he was incarcerated. (Real) Nancy Hollander, says that although many Guantanamo former prisoners have written books, Mohamedou is the only one who's authored his own book: “I think that's what makes it so unique because it's him, and it's what he went through that we can now portray in a film.”

Hollander was involved in the screenplay from the start and recalls, “I provided the filmmakers with the transcripts of hearings, I explained the law to them and the case, and I said ‘I know you can't include everything but I want you to know what really happened and then you can decide how you're going to put this into a movie’.”

Clarke adds that the filmmakers ensured they had input from all of the real people whom they were representing, and Mohamedou - also wearing a co-producer hat - Nancy Hollander, Lieutenant Colonel Stuart Couch and Teri Duncan all fact-checked everything.

The producer notes, “this has its production challenges because you can't have everything a hundred percent for real. It doesn't work dramatically or practically. We're not making a documentary but I feel like the two have come as close as is physically possible.”

With several drafts of the script taking shape it fell to writers Rory Haines & Sohrab Noshirvani to come on board and deliver the final draft for filming, with Noshirvani recalling “We started doing our research, speaking to Nancy, Mohamedou. Learning the intricate ways of Guantanamo which is a very confusing and confounding place and we spoke to some military JAG lawyers so we could come to grips with how military law works, which is completely different to the regular judicial system.

Haines adds “It was really about staying as true as we could to the material, talking to Mohamedou to go deeper than necessarily he put in the book sometimes, the same with Nancy, and digging into the history and trying to craft a story that felt true to everyone who was involved in it but also for an audience that is watching it. It’s a movie, it’s not just a series of events that happened you know?”

CASTING

For the character who would play Mohamedou, Clarke recalls the filmmakers wanted to cast someone North African if possible, who could speak French and Arabic and English. Macdonald, who knew Tahar Rahim from working with him on The Eagle, sent it straight to the actor. Tahar immediately said ‘sign me up’!

Macdonald recalls “I worked with Tahar before and we remained friendly and so, when I started to think about this film, who is an actor with a North African origin, who is incredibly charming and likeable and who has enormous range to be able to capture all the emotions that this role requires. You know there was only one answer. It was obvious right from the beginning. The casting director and I sort of looked at each other - well it's got to be Tahar.”

Rahim recalls his first reaction when he saw the title of the script, “I was like ‘no man’, it was ‘Guantánamo Diary’ and I thought it would be the same type of Hollywood story with terrorist roles that I refuse to play. When I first read the script I cried, I couldn’t believe that this guy has been through hell like this and at the end didn’t hold any grudge against anyone. It’s an amazing story, he’s a hero, an innocent man imprisoned and tortured, and as an actor – and as a human being – I think it’s a story that has to be told.”

(Real) Mohamedou says, “it’s a very difficult role for Tahar, he spoke to me about it. Of course it’s all difficult, our experience – whether it was pain or distress – was up there and then down there and then sideways. He’s got to do all of that in the scene and be aware of where the cameras are. It’s an even bigger challenge to portray a real life, living human being.”

Benedict was thrilled with landing Tahar in the role adding “he’s very cool and just very easy to spend time with and there’s a searing intelligence behind all of that. It really did marry well with what comes off the page and how Mohamedou had sounded when we talked to Mohamedou himself. And so it seemed like the obvious choice from the very beginning.”

Kevin Macdonald had talked about Jodie Foster for the role of Mohamedou’s defense lawyer, Nancy Hollander, six months before sending her the script. “Jodie is an actress who is known for doing a lot of entertaining films, very Hollywood kind of films. And so, I think it was very exciting for her to do something so different than what she has done before. So when I took her the script, she said, ‘Oh I really like this, but I need it to be tougher, the character needs to be tougher’. And her instinct was to take out all the sentiment, take [...] all of the kind of Hollywood out of it in a way I suppose. And I think that was a brilliant instinct and you know we made some alterations because of that. And you know it’s the genius of a great actor, who’s been doing it their whole life.”

Ackland remembers how originally the thought of landing Foster seemed like a too good to be true scenario “We thought about Jodie really early on but it was a bit of a pipe dream. You don’t actually think that someone like that is going to engage with you but she was very open to it and she and Kevin connected really well. She was amazing.”

Jodie Foster recollects, “I was so excited to hear about Kevin Macdonald, somebody whose work I’ve loved and somebody that I felt was so well suited to the material, somebody who would approach it with that kind of truthful documentary tone that it needed to have.”

Clarke comments, “we had to do quite a lot of work on Nancy’s character because she is unrelenting, she is not sentimental, and she is a career fighter. We also felt that it was really important, for the real Nancy Hollander, to represent her accurately as this rock that essentially, over fifteen years, helps Mohamedou, and still does today. It was a really tricky character to get right.”

Foster shares that she knew about Mohamedou's book, and story, and had lots of questions about Guantanamo and what had happened in that time, "interestingly, even though I lived through that time, I didn't have any of the answers. It was amazing to me that I knew nothing about it. I think we were all so shaken up by the events of 9/11 that there was such fear in America, but we didn't think very much about who was being interned."

Benedict himself found it hard to contain his enthusiasm and excitement at not only working with Foster but sharing such exhilarating scenes with her too "She's just so unbelievably lovely, she's whip smart, funny, easy to work with, helpful, collaborative and just a joy. And yeah, of course the fanboy in me is going 'I'm in a scene with Jodie Foster,' I can't not have those moments. I've grown up watching her films, to have the opportunity to work with someone like that is always a learning experience and a joyful one at that. And we both said we just wish we had more to do and that's always a good sign you want to work more with a person."

Nancy works alongside Teri Duncan, played by Shailene Woodley, who is an amalgamation of two attorneys, Teri Duncan and Sylvia Royce. Clarke reflects, "the moment Shailene read the script she said she was in, and she's been a constant support over the last nine months, asking, 'how can I make it work, what can I do?'"

Woodley elucidates, "any type of injustice, any type of tragedy when it comes to our failure as human beings to fully see another human being and put them through fair trial and properly practiced democracy, really gets my blood boiling."

Woodley adds, “to have the opportunity to be part of this story that is so real and so true for a few individuals, specifically Mohamedou, and to get it out into the consciousness of so many Americans and people around the world, I felt like it was part of my responsibility as an actor. I think some movies you do from an artistic place of just wanting to create a character out of nothing and sort of see what happens, and then other films you do, or I choose to do, not only because artistically they stimulate me, but because socially you feel like maybe they could make a profound difference in the world. I think that’s the power of storytelling and so this one felt just like an honor to be a part of.”

Clarke describes Shailene as a warm and effervescent person with a strong sense of social justice, which is why she “works so well alongside Jodie’s more serious ‘Nancy’.” Mohamedou was thrilled when he heard that Shailene was going to play Teri, “that’s just what she’s like; that warm energy we need from that character.”

Zachary Levi, who plays the role of Neil Buckland, a Federal agent and old friend of Lt. Colonel Stuart Couch, weighs in, “even if I’m perhaps not the most savoury character in the story, I wanted to be part of bringing this project to light and allow people to see that this really did happen; that this is a real person. I think the incredible grace of forgiveness that Mohamedou practices through all of that, everyone can hopefully learn through what was a very difficult time in the world.”

“My character Neil is an old school buddy of Stuart’s who happens to also be very entrenched in this specific case and these things that went down at Guantanamo. He works for one of the intelligence agencies or branches within the U.S. Government and so therefore is a bit of a gatekeeper when it comes to certain information that Benedict's Lieutenant Colonel Stuart Couch needs in order to run a fair trial in prosecuting Mohamedou." explains Zachary.

"Neil proves to be a little less than helpful in that regard because of his own traumas he felt through 9/11. It was causing him a lot of fear and unfortunate anger and hate that I think a lot of people were possessed with in that time. When something as tragic as that happens, trauma can really screw people up. So, I think that's where Neil's at and then ultimately also has this redemptive moment towards the end of the film which shows you that people are more than what meets the eye, we are all 360 degree of people. Every character in the film is not all that they're cracked up to be, and there's depth and complexity in all of us. That was a very big part of what attracted me to the role."

After reading the script, Benedict Cumberbatch added to his hat as producer. Benedict told the filmmakers, 'this is a great character, I've never done anything like this before. Can I play Lieutenant Colonel Stuart Couch?'

Cumberbatch adds "his buddy from flight training school was one of the co-pilots on one of the planes that flew into the South Tower, so he starts from there, as well as being a military lawyer. He's also a Christian man that wants to do justice and wants to bring people to justice. It's an extraordinary position to be in at the beginning of this film because you go 'well, okay I can understand why he just wants to see this guy punished'. So what happens to him in the journey of this film is he discovers through pushing and pushing and knocking on closed doors that eventually these confessions have been extracted and they include accounts of torture, of waterboarding and various other contraventions of the Geneva human rights accord, so he then takes a stand against his superiors and says I refuse to prosecute this case, this is wrong, it is unlawful, it is undemocratic, un-American and un-Christian. And I guess it's kind of where my sympathies lie most in the film, with someone who has every reason to want to find and persecute the perpetrator of that kind of an atrocity, that unforgivable act of terrorism, but in the process of looking at the supposed rock-solid confessions realizes they were all extracted under torture... that's not the way to get evidence. That's not the way to behave in the rule of law."

Macdonald adds that though in a relatively smaller part Benedict faced a huge challenge "He's got the hardest role in this film because he has to play a man who a lot of the audience will think is deeply unsympathetic to begin with but right from the beginning you feel like 'ok this guy, is part of the group, part of the military machine but there is something about him which is more thoughtful, more humorous – he has a great sense of humor."

Ackland was quick to point out how well Benedict wears both his producer and acting cap at the same time "When Benedict steps on set he is not the producer anymore, he is the actor and he is in the filmmakers hands and he is very strict about that. He's very passionate about making sure that when he is on set he is an actor, but when he is not and he's got his producer hat on he's great with script and I think it's another feather to his bow that he just really enjoys doing."

Mohamedou shares that he couldn't have hoped for a better cast, "even the personalities, the beauty of those people are so beyond me."

RESEARCH

Macdonald was keen for the film to be every bit as authentic and truthful as humanly possible, but some challenges proved to be a step too far: “Obviously I wanted to go to Guantanamo but it’s very hard to get permission and I couldn’t get permission to go. So that ruled out that whole side of it. But there has been a lot written about Guantanamo, a lot of journalists, a lot of investigative journalists have done a lot of things and we also did have access to both Mohamedou, his defense lawyers and on the prosecution's side we had access to Lt. Colonel Stuart Couch and they were all incredibly helpful.”

Writers Sohrab Noshirvani & Rory Haines were quick to point out just how invaluable having access to Mohamedou was, with Noshirvani saying “it’s his story and just speaking on the phone to him or on Skype, you can get a sense of what a man he is and who he is. But more than that he knows the process – he lived it – so we could not have done it without him and his input. If this was based on a newspaper article you would not have been able to do it because his book is so insightful and I don’t just mean in the way he talks about what Guantanamo looked like but the emotions; ‘Hey this is what it’s like to be ripped apart and ripped from your family and taken to some place you have no idea where you are and the kind of horrors that he lived through.’”

Haines adds, “I think it was important for us to be able to talk to the real person who lived it because not only do you get the accuracy, but you get this kind of amazing character in terms of what he’s survived and what he’s been through and how he still maintains himself. But it helps to know when you’re actually talking to him that you’re not trying to invent optimism and spirit when it's not there. You always worry when you are writing about these sorts of things and you think: am I just doing the tacky movie thing or am I just making this easier for the audience because I want to make it easier for the audience? We really tried to avoid doing that but Mohamedou really is a weirdly human person in that way and that was really fun from a craft point of view to get to grips with.”

(Real) Nancy Hollander, who lent her vast experience and intimate knowledge of the case to the filmmakers throughout the making of the film, says, “I spent hours and hours on the phone with them talking about little details; like how I got to Guantanamo each time; what I did while there; how I’d step on the plane; what were the guards like; and how I felt when I said goodbye and left Mohamedou. The truth is that I always cried after Teri and I left him, and needed a night by myself just to recover from being there. I hated leaving him there, over and over,” says Hollander, adding that she filled them in on “all of the emotional, physical and psychological background, so that they would have it to work with, to create what they were going to create.”

Hollander also met with Jodie Foster, who shares her personal passion for the role, “it’s one of my favorite things, to be able to immerse myself in something that really fascinates me. The law is something I’m really interested in, how it works and the intricacies of it, and you know, how our country is shaped by that. How the world is shaped by that. If there’s anything that made me believe in democracy and the rule of law, it’s been making this film. I think this film really drives that home. It’s the most important thing that we have and it’s our humanity.”

(Real) Nancy Hollander shares that Foster's performance is so powerful she recognizes herself in many of the scenes, "the way Jodie uses her hands, the way she relates to Shailene, the way she relates to Mohamedou. There's calm times, there's screaming times, there's funny times and she really just makes me feel like she kind of got inside me, although Jodie warned me that this is not an impersonation. She brings what she brings to it, and I recognize that, but she's really captured that moment in time that happened."

"Obviously there's a lot of research to be done on a movie like this," says Foster, "the history of the day, not just from our perspective but from an international perspective but at the end of the day, the most important research I did was meeting Nancy Hollander."

Shailene Woodley reflects, "Teri Duncan shared a lot, she was very open – I don't want to speak for her – but what I took away from her interviews online, was, 'you know it's scary to go up against the government; it's scary to walk into something without knowing all angles and all sides of the equation,' but I think more than anything, Teri's heart lies in justice and her heart lies in the simple truths of like compassionate and neighborly humanity. I think that overrode any fear that maybe she had."

Levi shares that he didn't have to do much to research, "almost all the information that I needed was at the fingertips of Kevin, who knew exactly what my purpose was in the film. To be able to do that, and opposite Benedict is just an incredible treat."

PRODUCTION DESIGN & LOCATIONS

Academy Award® nominated Production Designer Michael Carlin was tasked with re-creating the authentic environments of four worlds and two stories. Clarke comments, “the greatest challenge as a producer is making sure that we have enough money to make the film that we all want. We needed a healthy budget so we could capture the physical journey - Mauritania, Guantanamo, Afghanistan, Germany, Washington, Albuquerque – it’s huge. It’s not a chamber piece where you can get a house and shoot it all there. You have to have scale and that was very challenging.”

Having frequently worked together over the past fifteen years, starting with The Last King of Scotland, Carlin and Macdonald have a strong understanding of how the other works.

To locate the backdrop of four, very distinct worlds the filmmakers scouted a few international countries which could offer the full basket of their location and production requirements. Carlin explains, “we scouted in Morocco and in Serbia. In the end, Cape Town ticked most of the boxes. There is a lot of architecture that we could use and adapt to suburban America; an excellent construction and art department crew to build big sets; and many people with military training and extras with the right look for a number of characters, such as the guards; and in addition we were able to shoot a big part of Afghanistan.”

The only scenes the filmmakers chose not to shoot in Cape Town were those set in Mohamedou's country, Mauritania in West Africa. "We want to honor Mohamedou, his heritage, his family and his environment -properly," acknowledges Clarke.

Carlin stresses that one of the most important things to know about Macdonald is that his introduction into making cinema was documentary filmmaking, "even if it's a made-up story, you want to find the truth of that and recreate that. For a designer it makes things quite easy in a way, or at least it gives you a framework in which to work."

Macdonald's creative vision for the adaptation was to treat the story with integrity, and to ensure critical authenticity the filmmakers had the benefit of consultation with Mohamedou by visiting him in Mauritania.

Ackland recalls "one of the things that Kevin said from the outset was that we have to shoot this in Mauritania, which is where Mohamedou is from, and we said 'well we can look into it. But nobody shoots in Mauritania, it's not film friendly, it's in the middle of the Sahara desert...' So it was a real challenge, but he wanted the authenticity and when you see the film and the scenes in Mauritania it was worth it."

Carlin says that while GTMO (Guantanamo Bay), one of the world's most notorious detention camps, is still officially a secret and the plans of the environment aren't available anywhere "a lot of imagery has got out, but it's not very well labeled. When I showed Mohamedou the load of research I had gathered, he went, 'I was in that one; and this photo that you've got is from a movie and it's not from Guantanamo Bay'. He has a very good memory and had a lot of time to observe his surroundings, so we got absolutely factual information about where he was within the camp. It was wonderful to have access to Mohamedou.”

Carlin, however, still faced and took on the challenge of being faithful to the reality of Mohamedou's story within the 'constraints of making a movie', while having to redact information that may implicate the filmmakers' interpretation of GTMO, “we are not focusing on torture elements. The detail is in the mechanics of his incarceration and the indignity you suffer when you're in a place like this. We try to describe those the things that horrified us, that weren't specifically the torture.”

Due to its vastness the GTMO set was built in three locations; the main composites of Camp Delta and Camp Echo were constructed in Paarl, an hour outside of Cape Town, with other sections of the same composite set on the beach at Strandfontein, which closely resembles the location of the real bay, and the real camp in Guantanamo. Other set elements were constructed at the Cape Town Film Studios.

The filmmakers aimed to use the real colors in Guantanamo as much as possible, “we edited out a lot of orange and red so when we see those colors they are more powerful. All the dark parts of the film are cool, grey and concrete. We slightly desaturated and darkened a lot of the Guantanamo interior colors just so that photographically, it would work better and be a bit more sombre and depressing. Those parts of the film were all a continuous color, whereas Nancy's world in New Mexico has warmer colors, plants, natural fabrics and wood.”

REVISITING THE PAINFUL PAST

From the get-go the filmmakers were happy to welcome the genuine individuals, Mohamedou and Nancy, to visit the set. However, Mohamedou, had no authority to travel outside his country, Mauritania in West Africa. The government declined to issue him a passport from the time of his release from GITMO. He recalls, “the trip was never a sure thing because of my history of incarceration. My lawyer and all the team worked very hard to get me down here.”

For Mohamedou, the punishment seemingly never goes away, and he reveals that he was apprehensive when he applied for his visa, but muses about his experience at the South African Embassy. “They asked me many questions and I just looked at them, saying ‘do you know who I am?’ The commissioner said ‘no Sir, I don’t know who you are’, and I asked him to look me up on Google.’ Then everything, including the procedure, changed. It usually takes days to process a visa but he fast-tracked and granted mine in one day. I feel this is characteristic of South Africa, because of their history. I am so happy and so proud to be from this continent.”

The former prisoner surprised the actors when he arrived at a table reading at Kevin Macdonald’s house in Cape Town. It was the first time the cast met the ‘real’ Mohamedou.

He reflects, “when I got to the table reading, I was very overwhelmed. I was just like saying anything, because I was overwhelmed with happiness, with meeting those great people.”

All the talent was astounded and profoundly moved by Mohamedou's humility and lack of anger. Tahar says, "I hugged him, and when he was talking about a lot of different things I just looked and listened. What can you say? This guy in front of you is talking about what he's been through, with a big smile. I mean, you're just listening. His forgiveness is what makes him so special and what saves him to not fall into madness. He's not angry at all, it's impressive, he has the right to be angry, but he's not."

Foster says that Nancy Hollander is an extraordinarily brilliant woman who is just a ball of contradictions, "I think that's what I love about her the most. She's this very structured thinker, very smart, and very measured. She's careful about everything she says, and yet she loves her red lipstick and nail polish. She loves fast cars, she likes sports-cars, she likes digital equipment and yet she was this public defender with this long road as an activist. So many parts of her are conflicting, and that's what's beautiful about real characters, real people. Real people are not all just one thing. Nancy is really a combination of so many things."

Shailene Woodley's first meeting with Mohamedou was over Skype, "I feel like before you even meet this man, if you read the book or one article online, you feel the essence of his spirit so strongly. So before I even Skyped with him, I just knew how lovely he was. I knew how special and unique and radiant his spirit was, because you feel that; you feel that even in the air that exists around his name."

Woodley continues, "the first time I Skyped with him and his big smile came up, he said thank you for doing this movie and it just moved me so deeply because all I wanted to say to him was thank you for trusting us to breathe life into this in a cinematic way. It's his courage and ability to forgive, love, be unconditional and remain patient and calm in what would drive, I would think, probably 99% of humanity to a place that's very different from the place that he's in emotionally and spiritually and psychologically."

The authentic recreation of the GTMO set was a chilling reminder for the visitors. Hollander says, "the green mesh that they had put up is exactly how it was in GTMO. Mohamedou had poked a little hole through it so he could watch me arrive because he knew I would be coming for a visit. As I walked by this little detail, I just felt like I was back at GTMO."

Carlin shares, "when Mohamedou came to set, I was terrified. It was worse than opening a set to a director. We had made lots of little changes to the reality of the situation to accommodate cameras and differentiate one space from another; One thing about GTMO was that it was all the same, most of the cells are built on the same configuration."

"Most of Mohamedou's contact with Nancy happened in a room identical to the cell that he occupied when he entered the torture program," Carlin explains, "and after that, when he became a 'cooperating prisoner' he was in the same kind of cell, but with less restrictions. We wanted to stay truthful to the story but you can't portray thirteen years of time effectively in environments that are almost identical, so we made changes. I was really nervous that he'd be upset about them, but he wasn't."

(Real) Mohamedou shares his reaction to the raw essence and character of the set, “there isn’t anyone else I know of that has been to the same place, except me and Nancy. I kept asking her, ‘do you have the same feeling, this is real?’, and she said ‘yes’. In South Africa, they did a very good job. On set, Kevin and his ADs kept asking me very detailed questions like, ‘how did you wear this, how did you wear that?’”

Foster adds, “it’s such a special thing when you see Mohamedou and Nancy together as I’ve been able to do this week, while we’ve been shooting. Nancy feels very maternal towards him, and you can just see the twinkle in both of their eyes. It’s so obvious they really care about one another.”

Mohamedou is frank about his experience, “the scenes I watched being filmed were so realistic I felt very uncomfortable, and after ten or twenty seconds I couldn’t watch any more. I remembered the same thing again.”

Foster says, “I think it’s been very surreal for everybody, for Mohamedou and certainly for Nancy to see the recreation of GTMO; to see the camp set up, to see the barbed wire, and fencing and the concrete walkways, the kind of sad air conditioners; and all of the military men in their various regalia. It’s hard not to feel like you’re back in that environment. I think that was difficult for Mohamedou on his first day there, it was like his heart was pounding a bit.”

Carlin recalls, “it was interesting when Nancy and Mohamedou visited the set because he is a really humorous guy. You can’t imagine how someone could have his temperament having lived through what he has; he's not bitter and he can see the humour in just about anything, but when he came to set he was very quiet for a day, it wasn't the normal Mohamedou."

Shailene Woodley says, "whatever his life brings him for the rest of his life, he's here to move mountains, and he already is. The fact that he is able to be the man and show up as the man that he is today, he's changing the world. I think his effect will go on for centuries simply by the energy that he carries into every moment of his life. He's just a great human being and we don't have enough of them. He's the man I wish kids could study when they grow up in school. He is the man I think people should research and read about and listen to. The wisdom that pours out of his smile, the wisdom that pours out of his words, it's a wisdom that's a lost art in today's world. It's a wisdom that says everything that every single ancient religious, biblical or institutional text has ever said, which is 'just be kind to one another', 'love your neighbor', 'take care of one another', 'forgive', 'show up.' He kind of strips back all the distraction and chaos of consumerism and materialism and plants you right back down into the true seat of your soul. There's a lot of light in this world."

Foster says, "what Mohamedou has lived I think so many of us couldn't even imagine that we could ever survive it. Maybe the hardest thing has been that he has not been allowed to see his child, I think his boy is almost two years old now and he hasn't been able to see him." Foster continues, "the bureaucracy of various governments has done everything possible to continue to punish him and make sure he can't resume a real life, which seems counterintuitive. Mohamedou has a lot to teach us about our system, the Western system of democracy that he respects so much.”

Ackland comments “the most extraordinary thing about our story is Mohamedou: what he endured, the person he is and was and how he touched people throughout. I mean it is extraordinary. I think where 99% of us would be crippled, he wasn’t. I think Kevin has represented this quite superbly and with the blessings of everyone all along the way. [...] It’s such an extraordinary, true story and the biggest challenge by far was trying to get Mohamedou and his character into this film. The way that Tahar and Kevin have done that is inspiring.”

Macdonald notes “these things can be set in a brutal world but actually what you take away from it is the decency of human beings and the capability of people to forgive and change their minds. If ever there was a time we need to learn to see the humanity in the other sides of arguments it’s right now, when everything is so divided. So, I think that’s a really positive message and obviously I am keen for people not to feel like this is a punishing movie. I think this is a movie which has got great warmth and humanity at its core.”

Cumberbatch adds “one of the most heart-breaking moments in the film is when you feel that they have broken his spirit, where there is no hope... at the end of the day this is a celebration of the human spirit, this film, that’s really what it’s about. It’s about a human point of view, of what we can endure, what we shouldn’t have to endure and how to take solace from that. We realize the human spirit is a pretty extraordinarily robust entity and Mohamedou is literally living proof of that. I want audiences to be enthralled, I want them to completely fall under Mohamedou’s spell and care about his predicament. There's elements of it that are thrilling and elements of it that are shocking, elements of it that are deeply moving and profound and funny and joyful, and I think at the end of the day you're watching a man who is the personification of the human condition and the human spirit, triumphing over all that he endures, so it's really a tale of hope."
